Respiratory symptoms and fine particle air pollution: A systematic review of the epidemiological evidence. We conducted a systematic review of the literature to assess the relationship between respiratory symptoms and fine particle (PM2.5) air pollution. Studies were identified using electronic databases (PubMed and EMBASE) and by manually searching reference lists. Data were extracted according to inclusion criteria. Original studies were included if they assessed the relationship between respiratory symptoms and PM2.5 air pollution in the same location and over the same time period. Both cross-sectional and longitudinal studies were considered. One hundred and forty-nine articles were identified. Of these, 103 were excluded on the basis of title/abstract, while 42 articles underwent full-text review. Ten articles were included. Two studies reported stronger effects at higher pollution levels. Five studies reported no statistically significant association between PM2.5 and respiratory symptoms. The third article reported stronger effects at higher levels of air pollution, but this was for respiratory infections, not respiratory symptoms. Two studies reported weaker effects at lower pollution levels. Only
